FALLEN GREATNESS.

There is surely no more pitiable spectacle than that of a man whose mangled greatness lies before you, crashed by its precipitate fall from the topmost perch of fame. If those of us sho pever leave the earth should perchance stumble; no one except those 50 Kegs Assorted Nails, right by our side will discover our dis- 20 Bols, N. O. and Refined Sugar. comfiture. But when a man, by the force of circumstances, or, by the up- Bourbon ward bouyancy of his genius, rises, like the seronaut, far up above his fellowmen, until be attracts the gaze of the world by his brilliantly soaring flight, it is most lamentable to see such a man burled suddenly with crushing force back to ignoble earth.

Such cases have, however, very frequently occurred. In fact, it is difficult, if not impossible, to point to a single case of sustained preeminence among all the great ones of earth's history. Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, Xerxes, Alexander, Hannibal, Pompey, Casar, and the first Napoleon are all most noted illustrations of this general fact. They blazed, like comets, with ever inereasing brilliancy, until all men gazed, and gaped, and trembled. But in every case instead of maintaining their lustre, or even losing it with gradual diminutions, they, all at once, became a darkened, blackened spot, and the earth stood in awe at the dreadful psalmist true: Verily every man at his best estate is altogether vanity !

No one will be at a loss to discover the occasion of these reflections. Few men have given greater evidence of su perior genius than has Napoleon III. Few men have more impressed the generation with which they lived. Few men have exerted such an influence in the politics of the world as he. The greatest of his contemporaries have courted PLASTERING HAIR, NAILS, his friendship and deprecated his wrath. Upon the field of battie, whether in the tedious siege of the Crimes, or the subjugation of the barbarous tribes of Northern Africa, or BLUE GRASS, the brilliant but bloody plains of Magenta and Solferino, he has shown himself the peer of the first warriors o any age. As a statesman, he has ruled WILL PAY the most turbulent nation of Europe for over twenty years to the satisfaction of the great majority of its inhabitants. During this time, France has enjoyed the golden period of its history. Its commerce, its agriculture, its general intelligence have more than rivaled any other epoch of its life. Six Napoleon was the acknowledged primate of the earth. No other man held such a place in the world's estimation as did he.

But now, where and what is he? A guarded prisoner within the solid walls of Ehrenbreitstein. His throne cast into the river Seine. His subjects destroying even the plaster busts that would remind them of his existence. His wife and son fugitives from home. seeking an asylum among the traditional enemies of their country. A democracy, composed of his bitterest enemies installing itself as the acknowledged authority inthose very pa! aces of power, where he ruled for so many years. All this within and none so poor to do him reverence." Who can fail, at such a juncture, to think of old Cardinal Woolsey and his despairing wail at the sudden blighting of his blooming hopes.

"But yesterday, the word of Cosar might.

"Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness."
This is the state of man: to day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope, to-morrow blossome,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him.
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
And then he falls, as I do."

This world has rarely seen such a sight. Shall we not learn a lesson from it? Was Louis Napoleon a man of earnest piety? We presume not. He probably bowed at but one shrine, and that was the altar of his own godless ambition. For this reason, doubtless, has God brought him low.

What signify the most exalted hon ore of this world? They all do tade as a leaf, they are like a shadow, which continueth not. Why should men strive for them even to the utter neglect of their souls? "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul ?"

The ruling passion, if we may so speak, of his life was a desire that the Lord might be glorified.
